TWITTER has erupted in a fierce debate over Destiny magazine's decision to put Wits Student Representative Council (SRC) president Nompandolo Mkatshwa on its December cover.

Students used the hashtag #WeAreNotUlo to denounce the monthly magazine, which is acclaimed for its choice of influential cover stars, for giving the #FeesMustFall movement a single face.

The magazine released the cover featuring Mkatshwa draped in ANC headgear with a corresponding caption "#FreeEducation Year of the Student" yesterday.

Media have shone spotlights on Mkatshwa and former SRC president Shaera Kalla for their role as women leading the movement at Wits. Their male counterparts, former SRC president Mcebo Dlamini and Wits EFF leader Vuyani Pambo, have received less attention.

The four managed to rally thousands of students for the national movement that achieved the preliminary victory of no fee increases in 2016, but even then, students made it clear no single student should be spokesperson for the group.

This mentality showed in the comments to Destiny.

@Anza_VM posted: "This #WeAreNotUlo plot is nothing new... One 'hero' always gets lifted higher than the collective... Mande... Nevermind."

Others felt Kalla was just as instrumental as Mkatshwa during the students' fee struggle, so if the magazine wanted to recognise women, it should recognise both. Kalla handed over the SRC presidency to Mkatshwa on November 1.

@Kolie_Yola tweeted: "Apparently the outgoing SRC president isn't on the cover of Destiny because she isn't a 'pure' black woman (Imbokodo)."

Kalla's own response didn't share that feeling.

"It's deeply saddening how ppl will now fight about recognition, who was there through it all & who wasn't. Who cares? The struggle continues!" she tweeted.

Despite the backlash, some people defended Mkatshwa.

@Mlacash tweeted: "Truth is guys we can't all be on the cover of Destiny magazine, that's why we elect leaders who will represent us."

Some also took exception to Mkatshwa wearing an ANC headscarf on the cover.

@slezi wrote: "Nompandolo's affiliation to the ANC with that Destiny magazine cover left me puzzled because this was a student movement not solely ANC's."

Destiny magazine also defended its cover on Twitter and noted that it writes about issues that concern all South Africans across the political spectrum.

It added that its November cover featured DA leader Mmusi Maimane.

Destiny said Mkatshwa was chosen for the cover based on the fact that the magazine's "reader demographic includes a significant portion of young professionals, university students and graduates".

Asked why Kalla wasn't chosen as well, the magazine said: "We tried to reach out to Kalla but were unsuccessful. Furthermore, Kalla is no longer president, as Mkatshwa took office on November 1."

On featuring Mkatshwa in an ANC scarf after allegations had surfaced about her political ties affecting her ability to lead a nonpartisan movement, Destiny said: "While we saw merit in Mkatshwa wearing a neutral scarf, we supported her request to wear an ANC one as she felt it was a long-standing part of her identity."

"She has appeared in it in a number of other media images."

THE ROW between Noma, the wife of Home Affairs Minister Malusi Gigaba, and Buhle Mkhize is on the boil again.

International fashion stylist Mkhize, Gigaba's ex-girlfriend, said he should give his wife a rundown of his job description and explain that he has no authority to ban anyone from South Africa.

In an Instagram post, Mkhize, who lives in New York but is originally from Eshowe, KwaZulu-Natal, told Noma that her husband was merely an employee at the department.

"You should also school Noma, you have no power to ban me out of South Africa, it is my birthright. Wena ungumbeni wakwaNtabazabantu (You are an employee at Home Affairs) who can't abuse the power," she wrote.

Noma - who goes by the name Mrs Gigabyte on Instagram - and Mkhize have been embroiled in numerous skirmishes on social media.

The catfight is allegedly over Gigaba, who dated Mkhize before marrying Noma. In the latest showdown at the weekend, Mkhize dared Gigaba and his wife to show up at a "live media outlet" that would see them putting the controversy to rest once and for all". She says Gigaba chased after her and his now playing the dutiful husband.

Alongside a lengthy Instagram post was a screenshot of the details of an office telephone number which Mkhize claimed indicated a call from "South African intelligence" trying to get her to "shut-up".

Apparently the caller had threatened Mkhize, saying she should stop hanging up the "Malusi-Noma-Buhle" dirty linen in public.

"If you and wife want to speak, yekani ukukhamisa (stop wandering) on social networks. The three of us must go into some live media outlet with all papers in hand, ayi athengive njalo (not bribed newspapers). We should speak openly" she said.

Workplace blues for businesses

"IT WOULDN'T happen here!" is hardly a decent basis for a risk policy, and ignorance is seldom a good defence.

Nastascha van Vuuren, a director at Werksmans Attorneys, yesterday said South African businesses that didn't have up-to-date social media policies should be forewarned, referring to a number of historical cases abroad where companies had been held vicariously liable for statements posted by employees on online networks and in social media.

In the UK, for example, in the case of Otomewo versus the Carphone Warehouse, two employees posted the status update: "Finally out of the closet. I am gay and proud," on the claimant's Facebook page without his knowledge.

The court found the employer to be vicariously liable for the conduct, which amounted to harassment on the grounds of sexual orientation, because the actions took place during working hours and involved dealings between staff and a manager.

BEWARE: If employees post inappropriate messages on Facebook pages, the employer could be held vicariously responsible.

Similarly, in the US, in Blakey versus Continental Airlines, the court found an employer vicariously liable for harassment in a case where the plaintiff claimed that she was sexually harassed by fellow pilots posting defamatory and false statements about her on an electronic bulletin board used by the employer's pilots.

It is important to remember, notes Van Vuuren, that employers can also be held vicariously liable for the actions of employees that take place outside the workplace and out of working hours, if they concern the employer or employees. Van Vuuren urged companies to circulate clear guidelines on the extent to which employees may use the internet and social media during work hours, as well as what is considered appropriate content.

In addition, the employer should make it clear to employees that, by using social media on company equipment and during work hours, employees waive any rights to privacy, so monitoring can take place. - ANA

Married men have no one to turn to in a crisis

LONDON: If a married man needs a shoulder to cry on, there's always his wife.

Unfortunately, however, many husbands don't have anyone else. Married men are more likely to be without close friends who can help in a crisis than those who are single, researchers claim.

Nearly 2.5 million British men feel they have no one outside the family to turn to in a serious situation, the YouGov study found.

The pollster found that men's chances of having no friends nearby trebled between their early 20s and late middle age.

But the problem was more common for married men, affecting 15 percent of those with a partner compared with 11 percent of singles. It asked men how many friends they had outside the home with whom they could discuss money, work or health problems.

Some 51 percent said they had two or fewer, while one in eight said none at all. Sarah Coghlan, of the charity Moverment UK, said: "Men are expected to spend time with their wives, but at the cost perhaps of friendships. There are critical times when... isolation creeps in." - Daily Mail
